Playing with fire
Jon Robin Baitz’s “Substance of Fire” chronicles a father and son struggle to control the family publishing house.

It’s Portland Stage Co.’s final play of the season — and the last time Artistic Director Richard Hamburger will light up a production at PSC.

Will The Movies take over Temple Street theatre?
Rent break Nicked in the bud
When Morris Englander, president of Hoyts Cinemas in Boston, asked the city of Portland for a $100,000 break on the Nickelodeon Cinema’s rent last year because it was losing money, the city said yes. Half a Nick was better than none at all.

When Englander switched formats and slashed the Nick’s ticket prices last month, he asked for another huge rent break. The answer this time: maybe.

“Englander said they were doing more than breaking even. If that keeps up, the break might be less than $25,000. It might be nothing,” said Economic Development Director Virginia Hildreth.

Meanwhile, a competing Portland movie house is preparing its own plan to fill up seats in the Temple Street theatre.

Who will get nickel-and-dimed — the city, moviegoers or local business?

Hampering the handicapped
A powerful new federal law is on their side, but public awareness is not

By John Lovell

The teller at the end of the counter inside Casco Northern’s main bank offices in Monument Square looked around for her next customer. “Next,” she called out.

Kathryn McInnis, who might be five feet tall if she could stand up, was directly in front of the counter, but because she was in her wheelchair, the faux marble counter was above her head.

“Here,” the teller said again, looking around. McInnis leaned forward. “I’m right here,” she yelled.

McInnis — who is 13 years old and has been crippled by rheumatoid arthritis since she was 12 — has grown used to things like bank counters built without regard for people in wheelchairs. Still, they annoy her.

Now, she doesn’t have to put up with such annoyances: A powerful new law is on her side. The Americans with Disabilities Act promises an end to discrimination for the nation’s 43 million disabled citizens.

But most people, like the bank teller Kathy was up against on this recent afternoon, continue to overlook the day-to-day struggles that Maine’s estimated 210,000 handicapped residents can never forget.

This document is a mix of text and advertisements. It appears to be a page from a newspaper or magazine, with a combination of articles and product listings. The text includes a story about a handicapped-accessible ramp, along with various advertisements for lodging, health care, and food products. The layout and design suggest it is a typical newsprint page with a combination of text and graphics.

Free speech in an imperfect world

A recent edition of Casco Bay Weekly was controversially banned. The editors of the newspaper, CFH Weekly's March 5 edition, decided to publish an op-ed by Tom Hanrahan, Falmouth's director of public safety, in which he criticized the Catholic church and its bishop, Joseph Gerry. The decision to publish the article was met with controversy, as many felt it was inappropriate for a newspaper to publish such inflammatory content.

Casco Bay Weekly never has been and never will be balanced, objective or politically correct. It is not our role, nor do we have the resources, to make the world a better place. We are, in fact, little more than a public utility designed to be a forum for free exchange of opinions. We have never been, and are not designed to be, a forum for the exchange of opinions that do not exist.

Balance is nothing more than a rhetorical ploy. It is not a fixed point on a spectrum, but a moving target. It is perhaps best typified by television news anchors, who often change their opinions depending on the audience they are addressing.

Free speech and the right to express oneself are fundamental liberties. They are necessary for a healthy democracy, as they allow for the exchange of ideas and the correction of mistakes.

However, it is also important to recognize that free speech has limits. There are certain types of speech that are not protected by the First Amendment, such as hate speech and speech that incites violence.

In conclusion, while free speech is a fundamental liberty, it is not an absolute freedom. There are limits to what can be said, and it is important to recognize these limits to ensure a healthy and functioning democracy.

The genre world has undergone a transformation in the past few years, with what was once a very specialized audience now attracted to mainstream films. This trend began in the late '90s and gained momentum in the first half of 2000. Movies that cater to niche audiences have expanded their audience, and films once limited to a small group of die-hard fans are now being enjoyed by a much larger demographic. The result is a richer, more diverse film landscape, with a greater variety of viewing options available to audiences of all stripes.

STAGE

The fire burns high (and low) at Portland Stage Co.

This is Richard Hamburger's last hurrah at Portland Stage, and he has saved his best for last. "Sc hinterland," it's all from the grass. The story is simple: a man, the uplifting, the inspirational. You know the type. It's like he's a fireman, a cop, and a doctor, all rolled into one. As for the play title, it's all there. At the end of the day, it's easy to see what's going on. It's a fantasy, a dream, a reality, all tied together. It's a show, a spectacle, a production, a performance, a happening.

In the case of one-way traffic, the characters are "munity" people found by Nancy Hamilton in a neighborhood setting. The idea is to bring the community together. The play is about the community and the people who live in it. It's a show that's about the community and the people who live in it. Subversive artists retrench at Greenhut

In Portland as in much of the art world, there is a sense of uneasiness. The local art world is feeling the effects of the recession and the uncertainty of the future. The Greenhut gallery, which has been in business for over 40 years, is one of the few remaining independent art galleries in the city. The gallery has been struggling to stay afloat, but the artists who exhibit there are determined to fight back. They are planning to stage a major show in the fall, which will feature works by some of the most experimental and provocative artists working today. The show will include pieces that challenge traditional ideas of beauty and aesthetics, and will provoke a range of reactions from the viewers. Despite the challenges, the artists at Greenhut are committed to their craft and to the spirit of innovation that has always defined their work.
