The ice is gone from Maine's waters, and thoughts of boat owners have turned to summer. The air soon will be filled with the steady drone of powerboats cruising Casco Bay.

And with the return of the boats, one familiar scene will be repeated again and again. An engine idles, producing a subtle rainbow sheen on the water's surface, small puffs of blue smoke float along the waters surface then dissipate quickly. Then the driver hits the throttle and the film and smoke disappear in a noisy blast of churning water.

How many times does this happen in a day? In a year? No one really knows. Data on boats and their use is elusive. The Casco Bay Estuary Project estimates 5,000 boats are berthed in Casco Bay. But Casco Baykeeper Joe Payne, the head of the nonprofit environmental group Friends of Casco Bay, puts the number closer to 1,000. The state says that 113,590 boats are registered in Maine, but the National Marine Manufacturers Association (NMMA) says Maine has more boats than that.

A typical boat engine running for one hour produces as much pollution as a passenger car traveling 800 miles. But fume-spewing outboards may be a thing of the past as federal regulators gear up for a new battle.

While these figures are soft, the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) has come up with some hard numbers on emissions produced by boats. For instance, the agency discovered that an outboard motor running for one hour produced the same amount of volatile organic compounds (VOCs) as a passenger car traveling 800 miles.

Armed with these results, the EPA plans to propose a series of new regulations for certain types of nonroad engines — such as those on powerboats — beginning this month. Other proposed regulations in the series will be issued throughout the year.

How restrictive will these regulations be? That depends on the outcome of the debate over boats and their impact. Scientists have found pollutants in Casco Bay that may be attributable to powerboat emissions. But studies of source contamination are nonexistent. Environmentalists, too, are slow to understand the potential impact of powerboats.

Meanwhile, rainbow slicks and blue smoke will continue to be churned into the waters of Casco Bay. continued on page 8
A conversation with Bobby Boucher

Bobby Boucher, a front-line environmental worker for the past three years, has bottle redemption down to a science. A day at the ABC Redemption Center in Windham, Boucher, 30, gets a lot of gratification from his job. "Bobby's our champion," says ABC owner Walter Thornton. "He can count, sort and throw bottles across the room at the same time, and he doesn't miss too often."

How long do people go between returns? It varies. Some people don't bring them in all winter. Can you imagine being cold around your home? Some people show up with truckloads of bottles. A guy comes out of Portland and he has 100, 200 [worth of bottles], but you see, he collects them. The bottle line east of the Boulevard. They're the number one. Soda would probably be second after that, and then juice.

Ever see anything interesting in the bottles? I see everything: cigarettes, change, dead mice. That's happened five or six times. The mouse crawls into the bottle and can't get out. If you open the bag and a mouse runs out, it makes you jump. Sometimes all of a sudden starts running. A few people wash their bottles, but not many.

What else do you find? Whatever people don't bring in. I've found condoms, tampons, live chipmunks, dry ice, a whole mouse. I've found pens, keys, wallets, cigarettes, CB radios, spaghetti or macaroni, coins, money, pots and pans.

Do you ever regret your choices? You get used to it. I can't hold my nose or wear gloves. After a hangover, the wine really gets to you. In summer, you wonder if it's been in someone's mouth. I saw a garbage man and I didn't see the kinds of things I see here.

Paper industry bags big tax break…

Maine's paper industry claimed they need tax breaks to stay in business. By the end of 1994's legislative session, state lawmakers approved a big tax break — which the state's property owners who work in property income tax. The final hours of 1994's legislative session must have been the state's property owners' date with destiny. One of the key votes during that session was whether to agree to that tax break. And if they did, they would have to vote yes on the bill.

The paper industry's claim was that the tax break would save them money and help them compete with other states. But the legislation included a provision that would allow the state to continue providing the tax break even if the industry did not meet certain requirements. Some critics argued that this provision was unfair because it gave the industry a bargaining chip. Others said that the tax break was necessary to keep the state's economy strong.

In the end, the legislation passed the House and Senate on the last day of the legislative session. The industry claimed that the tax break was necessary to keep their businesses operating. Lawmakers argued that the tax break was a small price to pay for protecting Maine's economy. The legislation was signed into law on December 31, 1994.
When compared with other urban bays nationwide, Casco Bay is pretty clean. Maine doesn't have a history of heavy industry, and Portland is not involved in and produces fewer toxins than other coastal cities to the south.

But the bay is far from pristine. Scientists at Casco Bay's Department of Environmental Protection have found high levels of polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons (PAHs), a family of hydrocarbons associated with the combustion of petroleum products. In 1986, Peter Lassen, a scientist at the Maine Environmental Laboratory in Portland, conducted a three-year study of Casco Bay and discovered what he called "surprisingly high" levels of PAHs.

The Casco Bay Estuary Project, a federally funded five-year program established to create a strategy for restoring and protecting the environmental health of the bay, conducted additional studies more recently, and researchers again found high levels of PAHs. Project Coordinator Lloyd Damm said that PAHs may be a contributing factor, but added, "It's hard to tell. Everyone's a player. There are so many sources."

Other sources suggested by researchers include oil-soaked furrows, areas of a day, residual amounts of petroleum products, and the unregulated powerboats have produced more and more pollution as they have continued to increase in number.

"We know what many people do," said John Dorsey, an environmental scientist at the Woods Hole Oceanographic Institute in Massachusetts, "but their gear is not really unregulated. Their fuel consumption is causing major ecological damage," Lassen quickly added, however, that his scientists studies were only a small part of the problem and more data is needed to determine the impact on the coastal habitats. "Many of PAHs do have an impact, but we haven't made the links to the existence of PAHs and changes in the biota in Casco Bay.

"This issue is just starting to get attention," said Sharon Dennis, a staff scientist at the Conservation Law Foundation in Boston. In her study, she found that Casco Bay, by 1983, had more than 50 percent of the total PAHs in the atmosphere.

"If you add a typical off-road vehicle's emission of 1 to 1.5 liters of VAC's per second, compared to the 4 to 5 liters of VAC's from highways, your 1,100-mile road trip would be a 1,375-mile road trip."

In York, Vermont, and Sagadahoc, coastwise last year, the Maine DEP estimated that nonmobile sources, including powerboats and motor vehicles, contributed as much as 85 percent of the total PAHs in the atmosphere.

"Although the information is not complete, it is clear that mobile sources contribute a major part of the pollution, and perhaps even the entire total," said Dorsey. "It is hard to quantify the role of nonmobile sources, although it is clear that they are a significant part of the total."

suggested that new regulations should impose on shorefront businesses. The new rules might require permits for new projects, yet the state is still considering the proposal. "Like DOT and sewer, I'll think you for the years of living expenses, as well," added North at DOT. "We don't have to determine the degree that they can cause damage. Just stop them from going into the environment." Andrus is able to include water in Portland's shorefront water in lieu of fines in New Haven.

In Portland, the number of outboard boats increased from 340 to 530 between 1986 and 1989. The number of boats increased at a faster rate than the number of days were used, according to the DEP's Environmental Consultant. He said a nine-foot square boat needs to be at least nine feet square in order to operate.

To be more environmentally aware, the DEP has compiled a list of products that are environmentally friendly. These products are available at Ecology House, located at 49 Exchange St. in Portland.

MUTT WATERS

Powerboats stir up the mud in ways that are more pronounced than that of sailboats. They disturb the water's normal flow and cause the water to become more turbid. The sediments that are stirred up by powerboats can block the gills of fish and make them susceptible to disease.

The results of the study show that there is a correlation between the number of boats and the depth of the water. The deeper the water, the more sediment is stirred up.

Shower areas of lakes and bays (35 feet of water or less) are especially susceptible to turbidity, according to the DEP's Environmental Consultant. He said a nine-foot square boat needs to be at least nine feet square in order to operate.

The problem, he said, is that high-powered propellers stir up more water than sailboats.

"There are no answers to the board generation," he said. "The question is how powerful propellers stir up more water than sailboats?"

The DEP's Environmental Consultant believes that the effects of turbidity may be helping the natural process in the area.

"It's like nature's way of oceanography," he said. "It's like nature's way of protecting the water from being disturbed."
Editorial

Figuring out Earth Day

Earth Day is open to anyone, and once again it's not too late to make it count. It was first celebrated by millions in 1970 — and revived for a 20th anniversary fresh in 1989 — the movement has been a gentle in the growing pavement of U.S. green hills. It hasn't been co-opted (yet) by greeting card companies or political spin doctors. But that doesn't mean it's a lost cause.

The goal for Earth Day is to revitalize the environmental movement and to focus on one particular topic. This year, the topic will be the economy of the future. A global economic system that is based on sustainability and renewable resources is the key to a sustainable future.

The day will be marked by a series of events, including speeches, workshops, and workshops with experts from around the world. The goal is to bring people together to discuss the challenges and opportunities of a sustainable economy.

But Earth Day is not just about the environment. It's also about the economy. The idea is to show that a sustainable economy is not only good for the environment, but also good for the economy. By focusing on the economy, we can bring more people into the environmental movement, and help to build a stronger, more sustainable future.

So, make sure you get involved. On Earth Day, April 22, you can help to make the world a better place. Together, we can create a sustainable future.

Letters

Soley personality

I wrote and sent a letter to Senator Soley for my own personal reasons.

I believe Soley is an excellent shop owner, but I do not believe he is the best shop owner for our state. His decisions are not always in the best interest of our state.

I have been a customer of Soley's for many years, and I have always been satisfied with his work. However, I do not believe that he is the best shop owner for our state.

Soley's shop has always been one of the best in our state, and I have no reason to believe that it will change any time soon.

I believe that Senator Soley should be replaced by someone who is more committed to the best interest of our state.

I hope that you will consider this letter and take action to make sure that our state is represented by the best possible shop owner.

Eddie Palmieri creates a legacy for Afro-caribbean musicians

By Jim Prok](193)

Eddie Palmieri is at home in New York. There's a stream of phone calls, and the phone ringtone is unusually shrill, because he has to answer them all at once. The radio stations in the city, and the radio stations in the world, are all tuning in to Radio One, the most important radio station in the world for Afro-caribbean music.

Palmieri, who is in his mid-70s, is rarely out of the studio. He's recorded dozens of albums, and his music has been played on radio stations all over the world. He's also a prolific composer, having written hundreds of songs over his career.

Palmieri's music is characterized by its infectious rhythms and catchy melodies. He's a master of the accordion, a traditional instrument in his native Cuba, and he's known for his ability to blend different genres, including jazz, rock, and Latin music.

Despite his many accomplishments, Palmieri remains humble and modest. He's dedicated to passing on his knowledge to younger musicians and to keeping the legacy of Afro-caribbean music alive.

Palmieri's influence is felt not only in Cuba, but throughout the world. His music has been played in concert halls and on television, and his songs have inspired generations of musicians.

In conclusion, Eddie Palmieri is a true legend in the world of Afro-caribbean music. His contributions to the genre will be remembered for generations to come.

With tax season now behind us, I'm reminded of a little story that I'd like to
"Tell 'Em With My Accountant":
Last month my accountant and chief bookkeeper, a woman who happens to be perturbed by the small size of my particular bank branch, stopped getting us into that lovely tax time trap, when she asked me, "Do you know what makes this bank branch so unprofitable?
Let me answer that question for you.
It's you. The taxpayers."

My accountant went on to explore the various ways in which our bank branch could improve its bottom line. "First," she said, "we need to increase our noninterest carries."

"What does that mean?" I asked.

"Well," she replied, "we could start offering loans to people who aren't qualifying for them."

"Like who?" I asked.

"Like those people who are refusing to apply for loans," she explained. "They could be interested in a loan if we offered them one."

"That's a good point," I said.

"But," she continued, "we need to be careful not to lend money to people who can't pay back the loan."

"Why not?" I asked.

"Because," she replied, "we need to make sure that the people we lend money to can pay it back."

I nodded my head in

"But," she continued, "we also need to be careful not to lend money to people who are delinquent in their payments."

"Like who?" I asked.
