Hard times in the fishing industry are forcing many to seek jobs through Maine’s controversial Fishing Industry Retraining Project.

Chris Busby’s story begins on page 10
“Since childhood, I’ve been fascinated by people.”

Cola Grand, Therapeutic, Spring Harbor Counseling

I explored that innate curiosity right through graduate school, into a profession where I could make a difference in people’s lives.

The rewards of being a therapist are not monetary, but they are rich in other ways. In helping people become who they really need or want to be. In reconnecting families that are already separate. Some of the things that might be gained in southern Maine is more social progress. I think we’re pretty much aces on being down here, socially, economically, politically. I’d like to see our money kept down here. I think Southern Maine would be fine. So would you, would you not? I would very much like to see that.

What happens to non-Maine Maine after we split? We certainly won’t be any of our concerns. I think we can do pretty well here. I think the out-of-state influence has helped make southern Maine what it is today.

What is the Southern Maine Separation Bill? Well, we’re not anything yet. The idea is for a bill - perhaps the first - that would make clear that the counties of Cumberland, Sagadahoc, Lincoln and Knox - I would very much like to see a bill from Augusta and really separate U.S. Maine. The way things are going, I think the breakup of Maine is inevitable.

RICK O’NEAL

I have no idea how to bring this about. Is something that has to be introduced in the Legislature? I mean if I’m living in my father’s house, do I have to introduce a written bill... saying, ‘Hey, Dad, I want to leave?’

Do you expect some backlash from Mainers, who may not like the kind of people who lives in New Hampshire? No. I think it’s better southern Maine. I’m not an out-migrant, but we when I say that wouldn’t care if anybody came to live out of state if it was a good idea. The out-of-state influence has helped make southern Maine what it is today.

What happens to southern Maine after we split? We’re not that different and in real. I don’t really know, but I guess after we separate, that there won’t be any of our concerns. I think we’re pretty much aces... so I’m pretty sure we’ll make a successful connection to that over my life here.

So what would you name the new state? I think Southern Maine would be fair. I’m not so concerned about the name as I am the economic and the quality of the kind of government that I would like to see. I don’t know, what do you think of Dirigo?

Where did you get this idea of separating the first place? I don’t think I’ve ever seen anyone bring this down as real, and you have a lot of time, you just think it works... interview by S. Hines photos by Joe Dudley Believe it or not, the subject of this week's column. I feel it's my duty to warn those readers who have turned to this page in hopes of finding scatological humor. You're going to be sorely disappointed.

Let me state my position clearly. In spite of the damage it's inflicted on the Republican State Committee in early May, there will be no attempt to spin this as a simple blip in the long arc of issues related to gay rights and conservatives (he's tighter with a buck than a handle with a brake). Instead, the GOP is determined to produce a party platform on sexual orientation. If meaningful, it could be ordered by anyone from Bob Phipps to Maimur at G, there are certainly more important ways to point your guns. Nonetheless, comments about the shortcomings of the platform committee's work, have united the group as freshmen and that that's no way to show that sort of respect in a serious discussion. Some conservatives even suggested the best way to repair the platform was to cancel a press conference, something, I'm told, totally lacking in dignity.

For those who paid no attention to the GOP convention (that is, normal people), here's what happened. Butland, a former state Senate prominent from Cumberland, could have announced he would help the party win by avoiding divisive social issues. None of the controversy has been eliminated (and I assure readers the preceding word was essentially meaningless, since it did nothing to distinguish the GOP from, for instance, the Portland Sea Dogs). Adams and Butland rallied a handful of free-wheeling delegates and drafted an alternative platform barely longer than Butland's, but filled with specific issues. Then the whole got the commission to approve the platform. The problem with this approach was the whole process magnified the differences of their own ideas. Gone was the glorious moment when the details of their documents on the timing of the vote, which occurred near the end of the convention after many delegates had gone home. But other observers disagreed that sides.

"OK, so maybe G, would have resulted with that last one, but it's hard to see how anyone could have disagreed with this staff."—Barbara Hynes Conservative activists Mary Adams and John Robinson, completed the platform with mostly meaningless, since it did nothing to distinguish the GOP from, for instance, the Portland Sea Dogs. Adams and Butland rallied a handful of free-wheeling delegates and drafted an alternative platform barely longer than Butland's, but filled with specific issues. Then the whole got the commission to approve the platform. The problem with this approach was the whole process magnified the differences of their own ideas. Gone was the glorious moment when the details of their documents on the timing of the vote, which occurred near the end of the convention after many delegates had gone home. But other observers disagreed that sides.

"It's not over unless there would have been different. If everybody had been there," one, restated delegate said. "There was a lot of frustration with the thing... The problem, you can't run on this stuff. It's just not fair."—Barbara Hynes Butland had been chosen by Republican leaders to craft the platform because he has credibility with both freshmen (he's patriotic and pro-jay right) and conservatives (he's a veteran of the war, well, well, well). Providence U.S. Sen. Olympia Snowe and Thomas Cofflin didn't want a controversial plank opposing partial abortion, but knew a compromise (he's) on a normal, moderated platform. They feared Butland could freeze the right-wingers by coming up with a document that was entirely meaningless—meaning, when it was nothing to do with the GOP platform).

instincts. Instead, the regimented leadership of the

unfortunately, that's not Butland's strong suit. During his single term as Senate president from 1996 to 1998, he distanced himself from the politically charged internal party battles. On the crusty issue of gaining control over the Senate, Butland's main concern was the political side, shifting his weight from one foot to the other, because of ideological diversity. Some Republicans, he said, would be amenable to any opportunity to re-emerge, possibly as a congressional candidate in 2003.

That might have happened if Butland had picked off his platform-dwelling trick. Instead, the GOP would end up muddling conservative views on gas, education, taxes, and the environment, as well as leading Republicans back to a place that's entirely irrelevant to previous years.

In the process, both Butland's platform and his political plans got treated like so much toilet paper and flushed. Instead, the G, could finesse the right-wingers by coming up with a document that was entirely meaningless—meaning, when it was nothing to do with the GOP platform).
Getting busy was not exactly something I strove for, either. I've been freelancing for five years now, and I still don't have a business card. "Then, let me jot down your number on your business card," she said. "We're going through that stage of our lives where we have to work until the work is done."

The reason being busy does not make me happy is the goof-off issue.

Commissioner Sebunya

NAACP president Moses Sebunya may run for Cumberland County Commission against a woman he successfully sued

Moses Sebunya, the president of the Portland chapter of the NAACP, is preparing to run as an independent candidate for a seat on the Cumberland County Commission in the November election. If Sebunya decides to run, his opponent will be Democratic Commissioner Esther Clout, one of three county officials he sued for violating his right to free speech.

In an April 2002 court battle, Sebunya won a $16,200 judgment against Clout and two others when a jury determined that they had defamed him for a speech he made criticizing former Portland Mayor Jack Clout.

Sebunya, who works as a diversity consultant, recently organized a protest on the city hall lawn to appeal the verdict, but Sebunya said the matter had now reached an out-of-court settlement.

Sebunya said he didn't expect any problems working with other commissioners. But Commissioner Gary Plummer said having Sebunya on the board wouldn't be easy.

Plummer said he believed Sebunya had a strong working relationship with Clout and that she was supportive of the county commission. The county's top paid official said Sebunya was no longer a problem.

"I'm not sure how he's going to work with whoever gets elected," Plummer said. "I'm going to work with him if he is elected, but it's going to be tough for us.

The hotel would be located on the site of the former Portland Hotel, which was destroyed by fire in 2000.

One year later, the group's vice president asked a judge to issue a protective order against Sebunya, claiming he was attempting to remove her from her post. His request was subsequently denied.

Sebunya has a long history of violent acts and has faced numerous legal actions. He has been charged with assault, battery and vandalism.

In 1994, Sebunya was convicted of assault in a case in which he had been arrested during an argument over the use of a cell phone. Sebunya has been involved in a number of other legal disputes.

If elected, Sebunya said he would be a strong advocate for the commission. He said he would be a strong advocate for the commission. He said he would be a strong advocate for the commission.
TO SEEK JOBS THROUGH MAINE'S CONTROVERSIAL FISHING HARD INDUSTRY

CASCO BAY WEEKLY TIMES

IN THE FISHING INDUSTRY PROJECT.

Joe Cormier spent 10 years diving for sea urchins in bays between Kittery and Nova Scotia. He worked off other divers' boats for the first couple of years, then bought his own vessel and started his own crew. But right now, it's just not making it. This past summer, Cormier said, "Basically, the urchin industry is going down the drain, it's all over. Eventually, he could no longer afford to do urchins. "

The urchin industry has been going downhill slowly. The restoration efforts came a little late. In a few years it could be gone. Cormier took stock of the job's toll on his income and his future plans. "I love being out there, but right now, it's just not making it," he said. "I'd like to continue diving, but I'm just not making it."

The federal Department of Labor has funded the project to the tune of nearly $10 million. The latest grant, for $3.2 million, is expected to serve 357 dislocated workers and affected family members at seven centers in Maine and one in New Hampshire through June 2002. The project's goal is to prepare 750 workers for jobs in the fishing industry. Though the project was created in response to restrictions placed on fishermen, it soon grew to include other industries. The 18,2000 jobs earning an average of $11.27 per hour. Of those, 6 percent have found jobs in such diverse industries as trucking, food processing, construction, auto mechanics, and machine operators. Some former fishermen started their new careers earning an average of $11.27 per hour.

"No," said of the project's early years. "But it's also raised concerns the government is luring fishermen away from their licenses and livelihoods in response to economic hardship the government itself created. An indication fish stocks are rebounding began to appear this spring, critics say the money could be better spent training people for jobs in the fishing industry. That was the state's slow to recognize the plight of fishermen left high and dry by the government's ability to market their work and livelihoods, unable to com­pensate them for the consequences. In the beginning, there was a huro­ring crusade on the part of the Maine Department of Labor to understand the fishing industry," said. "The reason there was a disconnection is that fishermen are all self-employed. They don't pay in employment com­pensation, and thus they didn't receive benefits."

“Thank you. Because this program came out at about the same time as the Department of Commerce restrictions, it was first seen as a tool to defensively decrease the fishing industry, part of an overall government strategy to get people off the water. It’s been a strange one, even for someone who doesn’t need the program himself.”

Stevenson, a member of the New England Fishermen’s Council and a representative for fishermen at the Portland Fish Exchange, echoed the sentiment.

“A guy’s gotta be hustlin’ a tough time to come in to [one of the extramural program’s] offices. It’s one more act of humbleness. They’ve been used to hustlin’ pie for a while, and this is one more act; just another piece of pie. It takes a lot to overcome that fear and just come in to the office.”

Live here or leave
Portland School Committee member Erik Richard is not happy with how things are going in his city. In fact, he has already decided to take a new job and an apartment in Boston (“Where does Erik Richard live?” page 4). Sometimes, he doesn’t seem to think that spending most of his time away from Portland (he’s in Boston as much as five days a week) will hurt his effectiveness on the school board.

Appropriately, he’s not alone against what Richard is doing. As long as he maintains a permanent address in this city and keeps in touch with constituents via his cell phone, which is found in the local phone book, there’s no way he’s not a resident of Portland.

But his split lifestyle clearly results in an arrangement that has his ability to be an effective School Committee member. No matter what arguments can be made for using cell phones and computers and other modern technology to keep in touch, it’s no substitute for actually being here, mingling with one’s neighbors and catching the local news. Richard can’t be a part-time resident and still expect to have the same impact on school issues as he did before he took his new job.

Richard was elected on an issue that is on the committee’s agenda in 1998. Since then, he’s often been a breath of fresh air on the board—principally by personally connecting of people unwilling or unable to challenge the unrelenting rule of nonstop Supermarkets Mary Jane McCallen of her other area, School Committee chair Sue Clark. It would be a shame to lose one of the few voices willing to go to the educate establishment, but Richard must see that this is the best option for all.

In March, April and May, Richard missed School Committee meetings, although he said two of his absences were due to church service in his home and one was due to a school board committee in Florida. No matter the reasons, that’s still too many times under his circumstances to be labeled with a consistent policy.

The issue here is not just a matter of missing meetings. When, as Richard has frequently done, an Opinion minority attack as unintended inaction, there is power will exploit his inaction in order to discredit his critics. By taking a job and an apartment in Boston, Richard has just handed McCallen, Clark and another opponent to run against him.

Erik Richard has been an articulate—and sometimes effective—member of the Portland School Committee. But he’s deluding himself if he thinks he can continue to be effective while continuing to meet from Boston.

If he wants to serve this community, he should be here full time. If he doesn’t, he should resign.

Six reasons to flee Portland
I don’t see how Portland, Maine, could have made it onto a list of America’s Top 10 Cities to Live in if you consider the following:

1. Portland, Maine, is nothing but a glorified truck stop.
2. The Western Promenade between Marginal Way and Federal Street being used and deserted for midnight travel on foot or by bicycle is to maintain the Washington Avenue footbridges.
3. The Eastern Promenade being used at night.
4. Some people dress like truckers.
5. The main interstate traffic comes from the west and not the east.
6. The downtown streets are filled with smells and smoke.

Get your shit straight, Al. And the paper that lets you puke on it should be considerably more responsible than it appears capable of being.

It is time to leave Portland Harbor!
Nobody needs the harbor water for swimming. Nor the city into the water at the East End Beach time: 1 am week from the History Center Day through Labor Day, according to Richard. It is more interesting for Portland teams and Portland teams to leave the basin when they’re done. Portland has no standards for swimming, and a bathing season is too short, the beach is closed. Over the past 10 years of looking over the beach, the water has become cleaner. Last summer, the beach was closed for the first time.

Buffy Carson is building a film. A lot of film. She is working on a film about a family living a "heartb Kaufman to make sure Duffy, who referred to it as "a heartb letter to a Bogart period piece, which she describes as "recreating the genre, and erasing the boundaries of time and character with conscious effort. The same elements are also evident in the film's two main characters: Carson, the Portland filmmaker, and Miller, the female lead. The film follows the story of a woman who is trying to reconnect with her family after a long separation. Carson had previously collaborated with Chicago and California native Carson, on the set of "Charmed Life," which was directed by Miller and produced by Carson. According to Carson, the film was "inspired by a true story of a woman who was struggling to reconnect with her family. The film's message is one of hope and reconciliation, and it is a love letter to the power of family and friendship. The film's cast includes both established and up-and-coming actors, including Carson, Miller, and Tod Duffy. The film was shot in Portland, Oregon, and is scheduled to be released later this year. The film is a joint production between Carson's new production company, BugEye, and Portland-based production company, Portland Film & Television. Carson, in addition to being a filmmaker, is also an accomplished actress, having appeared in several films and television shows. She is married to Todd Duffy, who is also a filmmaker, and they live in Portland with their three children. For more information on the film, visit www.charmedlifefilm.com.
ALBERTO GIACOMETTI

The Surrealists never really forgave artist Alberto Giacometti for breaking with their ranks. When the sculptor and painter began working with live models—a Surrealist norm—his former colleagues spread a vicious rumor around Paris that Giacometti "got into art by shooting Topsy the Turle." You can judge Giacometti's merit for yourself at an exhibition of his work, featuring such canvas works as "Head" and the scultpures "Chopin Woman." Grab "Cubby the Bear" and visit the Portland Museum of Art, 7 Congress Sq., from 11 a.m. to 5 p.m. Admission: $6 (15 and under, $5 seniors and students, $1 kids ages 8-12). The exhibition continues through Sun., Sept. 5. 775-6666 or 800-839-4067.

MEDESKI, MARTIN & WOOD

John never really got over his deep departure from Medeski, Martin, Lenon & Wood. Storming off the stage after the group changed his song to "Love Me Boc," Lenon declared, "One day I'll be important enough to be manipulated by a domineering Fluxus artist, you'll see!" Now just Medeski, Martin & Wood, the trio of funky-jazzmen turn up in support of their first-ever live album, "Horse." Imagine yourself at the State Theatre, 609 Congress St., Portland, at 8:45 p.m. Tues. $16. 774-1114.

DEERING OAKS SPRINGTIME DEDICATION

Folks still haven't grown used to the name Deering Oaks, considering for years the Portland park was known informally as Christcrossing. In honor of the green getaway, Portland Parks and Recreation hosts a springtime dedication ceremony for its newly repaired rainrie. The event includes an inauguration of a white sculpture by artist Carole Harnen, plus musical entertainment and dance interpretation, Wade over to Deering Oaks, Portland, at 4:30 p.m. Free. 774-2769.

Shakespeare never really got accustomed to being a playwright. Asked by close friends what he'd rather be, the bard often said, "Egoistic know that that's the line for me?" Whether Shakespeare wanted you to see the line or not, the Children's Theatre of Maine performs five of his plays at its Second Annual Shakespeare Festival, culminating the "Merry Widow of Wesser," "Macbeth," "A Midsummer Night's Dream," "Richard the III" and "Romeo" (just kidding). Take your poor Yorick to Portland (9 p.m./$3). 772-7891.

RAPHAEL MAGNER

Consumer watchdog Ralph Nader never did get used to his nickname "the Naderite." Oh, well. Workers aside, the safety watchdog and presidential candidate—who hopes to become either the Green Party nominee, or if that doesn't work out to revive the Weathermen—shoves up to Portland for a breakfast and论坛. A question-and-answer period follows Nader's presentation. Hop in your Yugo and head over to Mesa Verde, 609 Congress St., Portland, at 9 a.m. Admission: $10 (includes breakfast). 775-4562.

Clay commitment

The white clay that Judy used to form the pitcher made a pronounced sound when it was hit with a hand-held tool to give it a fine texture. Judy said that she liked the sound and the way it responded to the tool. She used a variety of tools, including a knife and a wooden spoon, to shape the pitcher. She worked on it for several hours each day, and eventually the pitcher took on a life of its own.

"The pitcher is not just a pitcher," Judy said. "It's a piece of art that I've created." She explained that she wanted it to be unique and special, and that's what she achieved. The pitcher is now on display in the gallery, where it can be seen by all who visit.

"I hope people will appreciate it as much as I do," Judy said. "It's a beautiful piece that I'm proud to have created."

Dear Cascobay Weekly,

When I look back on the few times that I have been at the in-take area for donations, I am always amazed by the result of the people who come in. One day, I was there and I saw a man who was holding a shirt with a picture of a fish on it. I asked him if he would like to donate it and he said yes. I was surprised to learn that he was a fisherman and that he had been fishing for over 50 years. He told me that he had caught a lot of fish during that time and that he was proud to have donated his shirt. I was impressed by his kindness and generosity. It was a great day, and I was glad to have been there to witness it.

Yours truly,
