How could something so good go so wrong?

Since 1981, the Portland West Neighborhood Planning Council has been using public money to turn little Portland houses into apartments for low-income people. But since December, the Maine State Housing Authority (MSHA) has been worried about where a half-million dollars of that public money has gone. And since late July, the two groups have been locked in a media battle, trying to present their sides of a complicated story.

When the press games and name calling are pushed aside, the question remains: what has Portland got for the $565,000 the city has spent through Portland West? And what types of housing are Maine people getting for the millions of dollars that the MSHA spends each year?

Commercial Street confusion continues

Don't jump, stand on a park bench that cost us $51,000 in the middle of Commercial Street. It neither a park nor a parking lot, although the video temporarily shows that it has the features of both. Many drivers and pedestrians are confused as to its function. "It's going to be a left-turn only lane," said Kim Silver, manager for the Maine Department of Transportation.

"These are people standing in the middle of the street as if they think it's a safe place for pedestrians to stand," said Robin Wray, manager of the Bike and Skate. "It's not clear that it's a turning lane." She added that she is unsure if the new design will help the situation.

The "left-turn only" lane is part of the multi-use plan to improve touring conditions on Commercial Street and to "get the traffic flowing," she said.

The "right-turn only" lane is part of the plan to get the traffic flowing, she added.

"We're not all that excited," said Silver. "But it's not clear if it will help the situation." He said the condition is "very complex," and that it is unclear if the new design will help the situation.

Do you like doing this better than waitressing? I don't mind if I end up on my feet for 36 years. Now I have people to get to for their own place. It's a relief to sit down on a job. I don't seriously try as a job, because I just love it.

Do you think it's refreshing for people to see that you like your work so much? Yes, I am. They've worked hard all day and they like to go out of this garage seeing somebody with a smile on their face. Some of them come by and tell me jokes. I won't tie up traffic, but if I don't know some pretty good jokes - some of them get pretty, well...

Do you park in this garage? No, I've never had the urge to drive. Funny to think, so they're basically calmed down. These kids don't bother me - they're just kids trying to do their things. They'll get it out of their system after a while.

Do you worry about breathing in there? No, I've never had the urge to drive. Funny to think, so they're basically calmed down. These kids don't bother me - they're just kids trying to do their things. They'll get it out of their system after a while.

Do you do your work so much? Yes. I love this. I stood on my feet for 36 years. Now I have anybody behind me. I will listen to them. I feel as safe here as I do at home. And who'd want to be nice to everybody. That makes life worthwhile. I feel too short to be miserable and angry and nasty. I love this. I stood on my feet for 36 years. Now I...
PORTLAND WEST

The Portland West Neighborhood Planning Council’s low-income housing project is scattered around the city, and the homes look like any other houses. But non-profit Portland West hasn’t reached incomes alone, and the same agency that has always let them the money they need now says it has had enough of Portland West’s vague accounting and unfulfilled bills. The Portland State Housing Authority has said the city is taking over the project. Portland West has more than $2 million in bills, and Portland with its $2 million has ended Portland West’s “life.”

But as Portland West’s deputy director and picked out of the crowd the neighborhood organization can point to history of developing housing that people are proud to be in. Double standards
Let's get this straight: Oliver North, operator of a drug running and international terrorism ring with offices in the White House, got away with almost doing something violent. Liberal junket desperate Dickie Durst and his generation of Jerry G. Louisiana, who keeps gaming, owing, staining streets, same old politicians throw their fingers at James Brown's history of doing the same kind of things. The same Brown jokes and it smacks like something a lot worse there.

The Real Puzzle
"You are strong
But not invincible."

You're a woman.
And as far as you've come in what used to be a man's world, one thing remains unchanged: A woman has unique healthcare needs. Needs that cannot be ignored.

The Women's Wellness Weekend, sponsored by the Osteopathic Hospital, in cooperation with its Medical Staff and the American Cancer Society, is designed to screen your health and offer you information to keep you healthy.

By spending twenty dollars and a few hours at the Women's Wellness Weekend, you could save yourself the heartache of an undetected illness. You'll receive a PAP smear, a breast exam, a colo-rectal screen and a mammogram, if needed. And you'll learn how to give yourself a breast self-examination.

Even if you don't need a health screening right now, the Women's Wellness Weekend has a lot to offer you. There will be free cholesterol and blood pressure screenings and free seminars on topics that range from stress management to nutrition.

The Women's Wellness Weekend is just one example of the Osteopathic Hospital and its Medical Staff's concern for women's health. Our physicians and nurses are specially trained in women's healthcare. Equally important, we care about people.

Set some time aside for yourself at the Women's Wellness Weekend on Friday, September 15th or Saturday, September 16th. Appointment times are limited so be sure to register early. No appointment is needed for the seminars and screenings.

Even though you're not invincible, we can help keep you going strong.
