Urban trailblazers trek through Portland

By Paul Kant

You’re walking a path through cuts of pine woods that rise 60 feet on both sides. From the distant lowlands drifts the smell of a salt marsh. After a quarter-mile more of rolling terrain, the trail emerges through shrubs to open ground. Unpacking a sandwich, you stride across a raised boardwalk which crosses reeds and spartina grasses. Sitting on the weathered boards, feet dangling above the marsh, you eat and gaze out over the fronds of grass, just beginning to turn their ocherous shades of autumn.

Suddenly there’s a flurry of movement in the reeds; a great blue heron surprises you—rising as slowly and majestically as a dirigible, seeming to float off into the sky as it pumps its wings gracefully. A little farther down the path, at another place on the marsh, the sound of rustling halts you suddenly. Looking up, you watch a belted kingfisher as it hovers, working the river for fish.

Where are you? Moosehead Lake? Acadia National Park? No. You’re right here within Portland city limits. Thanks to a joint public-private effort, you will soon be able to walk three miles of trail in the wilds of the Maine Audubon-owned Fore River Sanctuary, then—after crossing a connecting street by car—arrive at Capisic Pond and continue communing with nature for another few miles. These sections of trail are only the first step in a projected loop of greenways around Portland. In all, some day there could be approximately 30 miles of trails that connect Portland’s open spaces and stretch out to neighboring towns. But it is going to take a lot of money, cooperation from private landowners whose properties are crossed by the trail, and the sweat of a growing number of local volunteers before those trails are a reality.

The homecoming of Joe Payne

Interview by Dan Kreis

A dock cementing huntsman, who's the superlative air or paper power plant superintendent and power plant managers, haven't even inquired about Joe Payne. In Casco Bay, they know him simply as the baykeeper. Indeed, they know very little about Joe Payne, either.

Directly across the bar from Payne's modest shack, a light brown wooden craftsman's cottage, a boat stirring up a beautiful Casco Bay is pyramiding on the water.

"Getting home again is part of it. For Mainists born and bred, most of us want to work here. I've been inching my way toward it."

Joe Payne

When you're on the bay hanging around with lobstermen, fishing crews, sailors, and environmentalists and others of the ethic I and my wife have. We live in a passive solar-powered house and burn wood, which has its own air pollution problem.

And what do you think might be the role of the baykeeper's counsel? Something along the line of George Bush's counsel of war?

"I'll train the people how to take samples, how to be eyewitnesses to the environment and make notes on what they see — to know their piece of the coast." Joe Payne

"I think, also, that it would be a good opportunity for us to get off the hook by

What will a typical day in the life of the Casco Baykeeper be like?

Friends of Casco Bay has announced that you're going to be in charge of a new "stewardship program." What will that be?

That's something I'm really excited about. Our water quality monitoring program, our citizens stewardship program is a program where we'll volunteer. I'm convinced there are tons and tons and tons and tons of interested people who just need direction, who are going to do something to help the environment.

We'll do, once we design the program — you'll see this by next year — we're looking for Casco Bay and proposing areas that we feel we can rationalize. We'll train people to do this. We'll look at how they're going to react to this. We might be getting a lot of people to work on this. We'll go out and get to know the people there; we'll build a database; we'll get people involved; we'll get people interested and more people will be interested.

If we find a problem, our first step is to get the people who work on the water, meeting the people who work on the water. We'll then work on the people who build their relationships, in which we'll ask people: "What do you think we should do?" We'll put a little network in place to talk to people who are interested in the area.

URBAN TRAILBLAZERS

The idea for a series of trails linking parks and other open spaces around Portland goes back to the 19th century. In 1887, Mayor Foster Foster (founder of Portland) named three parks and other locations to create a path system linking Foster Park and others—so users could choose several parks for their trail system. Foster Park is a favorite destination for hikers, and the area is now a popular trail destination.

"In some places, the trail follows the bed and to the top of the old railroad. Spencer said, heading west, "where we once cut the Falmouth River to the Casco Bay. It's amazing, and I've seen that you can still walk west that trail and all day long on the same path. This was a tremendous break for the trail and we are still developing it."

Spencer set a pace for the city with regard to trail building, which is now being continued under the management of the Portland Trails Association.

URBAN TRAILBLAZERS

TRAILER TIME: Maine's conservationists have led the way to a network of trails that provide access to the coast, woods, and mountains. This network includes trails in Casco Bay and Portland Harbor, where visitors can explore the coastline and enjoy the natural beauty of the area.

"As one of the most densely populated areas in the country, the Casco Bay region offers some of the best urban trails in the nation," said Trailblazers President Sarah Smith. "With more than 20 miles of trails, we're pleased to offer these trails to both locals and visitors alike."

The Casco Bay Trail is one of the most popular trails in the region, offering stunning views of the bay and its surroundings. The trail is open to the public year-round and is maintained by a team of volunteers and conservationists.

"We're always looking for new ways to improve our trails and enhance the experience for our visitors," said Smith. "We're excited to work with our partners to create a network of trails that will help preserve this valuable resource for generations to come."

The Trailblazers are committed to protecting the Casco Bay region and its natural resources. They work with local government agencies, non-profit organizations, and volunteers to create a network of trails that will help preserve this valuable resource for generations to come.

For more information on the Casco Bay Trail and other urban trails in the region, visit Trailblazers.org. A special thank you to our partner, the City of Portland, for providing space for this article.
Stop the War!

By Cary Smart

Startling in January, the State of Maine will add certain combat veterans to the list of Maine veterans who qualify for special commemorative license plates saying "Veteran" at the bottom of the plate. Men and women who have served out of patriotism, bravery, and in utter defiance of the state of Maine's military service record, will now be eligible.

"Veteran" plates, the state should also make available plates with the words "War Objector." Yet better, Mainers could save themselves the $10 by shifting out "Vacationland" (or "War Objector") themselves. A law passed by the Legislature in 1990 allows Mainers to alter their plates as long as they don't obscure any writing, the registration stickers or the word "Maine.""

"Drowning By Numbers"

William Friedkin's new film stars Jonathan Rhys Meyers as a parapsychologist, who, along with his team of researchers, tries to establish the existence of ghosts in a haunted house. The film explores the boundaries between science and superstition, and the effects of paranormal activities on human behavior. The plot centers on a young couple who move into a house haunted by a series of mysterious events that lead them to question their sanity and the reality of what they are experiencing.

definitions of haunted houses.

Greenaway's women are ruthless independents while his men are the stereotypical manly men. The story is set in England during World War II, and revolves around a group of people who are preparing to defend their city against German bombing raids.

While Greenaway's eccentric vision of the sordid games people play to save themselves is a provocation, it is also a commentary on the nature of human behavior and the ways in which we seek to control our destinies. The film is a critique of the ways in which power and control are used to shape individual lives and the larger social structures they inhabit.

The Hillary Clinton documentary film directed by Jane Campion, which will be screening this weekend, explores the former Secretary of State's political journey and her role in shaping contemporary politics. The film is a powerful examination of the challenges and complexities of leadership in the contemporary world.

The film features interviews with Clinton and other key figures in her political career, as well as historical footage and analysis. It provides a comprehensive look at Clinton's time in the public eye, from her days as a young lawyer in Little Rock to her tenure as Secretary of State.
