Teenage wasteland
Some teens endure the shelter shuffle, others still need a safe home

By Eric Hannelius

On July 15 the six-bed Brentwood Group Home for boys in Portland closed its doors to any more 12 to 15-year-old youths who needed a place to call home. Youth Alternatives of Southern Maine, the private, non-profit agency that ran Brentwood, didn't close the group home because there weren't enough 12 to 15-year-old boys to fill the facility. The agency's executive director, Michael Tarpinian, said: "The Brentwood home was designed for troubled kids, not emotionally disturbed kids."

According to Tarpinian, DHS has been put into the difficult position of having to "screen out" which kids it will take into custody and which it won't. The screening results from a combination of state budget cuts, an increase in the number of emotionally disturbed youth coming into the custody of DHS, and DHS's reluctance to take kids out of abusive homes because there aren't enough homes, group homes and residential treatment centers to which to place them.

Hemp praised, raidled

A troupe of marijuana advocates spent Sept. 20 in front of the Maine State House, selling T-shirts andorgenizing a protest against the illicit and illegal hemp plants.

"Goddamn Maine Nurses..." hemp prohibitionists read one of the shirts displayed on stalls set up along the entrance to the Capitol. Angerinn into the shirts were hemp products—samples of a hemp bag, a book made of hemp paper, a hemp seed oil, a search of hemp fiber.

The Maine Nurses Forum is part of the three-day "Statewide Action for a Better Future," an anti-hemp protest network designed to generate awareness of the uses of hemp through history.

The State House display was set up of about five members of the Lexington, Kentucky-based CAN, whose goal is the legalization and commercialization of marijuana. Group members are traveling around the eastern states, taking them to state offices, health care centers and other public places.

Kevin Ague, a spokesman for the group, said CAN has a mailing list of 200 people around the country. He said the group supports all laws for possession of marijuana and does not necessarily advocate smoking the drug. "We are at the information stage," he said.

The Maine Nurses Forum supports the efforts of the nurses to address health care issues. "We have a health care interest in hemp," said the group's spokesman.

Ague said the nurses have a number of concerns about hemp, including its potential as a pain reliever, its use in the treatment of cancer and its potential as a source of income for the state.

The CBD oil is also used to treat chronic pain and has been shown to have anti-inflammatory properties. It can be used in a variety of ways, including as a massage oil, a salve, or a capsule.

Health Screenings Are Only $25 During Women's Wellness Weekend.

Just Think What You Could Save.

Whether or not you live for bargains, please do not miss this one. It could save you a lot more than money. It could save your life.

On Friday evening, October 6 and Saturday, October 7, the doctors and staff of Brighton Medical Center are once again volunteering their time to offer pap smears, breast exams, osteoporosis screenings and mammograms, if needed, to the women of Southern Maine. This year, in order to expand the services to more women, Westbrook Community Hospital and BrightontvronkWalk on Clinic have joined in by opening their facilities to the program.

Even if you don't need a health screening right now, Women's Wellness Weekend has a lot to offer you: free cholesterol and blood pressure screenings, exhibits tables, and free workshops on women's physical and emotional health including massage therapy, relaxation techniques, weight loss, parenting and more.

The Women's Wellness Weekend is just one more way Brighton Medical Center shows its concern for women's health. Our doctors and nurses are specially trained in women's health care. Equally important, they care about people.

Trust yourself to the care you deserve at Women's Wellness Weekend on Friday, October 6 and Saturday, October 7. Be sure to register early for a health screening. Appointment times are limited. No appointment needed for workshops or to visit the exhibits.

HAVING MADE SUCCESSFUL ROPES OUT OF LINING THE FUGITIVE...
Paving Maine

the airlines to that market and the trolley railroad made it a reality with their sights set on bringing more traffic to their terminals.

The great Portland Boro formed itself to run the Portland Union Railroad, which would be the precursor to the Portland Railroad, which ran from the trolley line to downtown and then to the waterfront. This was the trolley line for which Portland is known, and it remained in operation until the 1930s.

The trolley system continued to grow and expand, with new lines being built and old ones being replaced. By the early 1900s, the trolley system had reached throughout the city, including to the suburbs.

In 1907, the Portland Union Railroad
became the Portland Rapid Transit Company, which was later renamed the Portland Traction Company. The company continued to expand and improve its system,
adding new lines and replacing old ones.

The trolley system played a major role in the growth and development of Portland, and it remained in operation until the 1930s when automobiles became more prevalent and people began to use them instead of trolleys.

Today, the trolley system is a reminder of the past and a testament to the ingenuity of those who built and operated it. The trolley system was a key part of the history of Portland, and it continues to be a part of the city's identity.

From his DBH office at 507 Forest Ave., Morgan and his staff have seen 200 or so kids coming through during the day, and many of them have no idea what to do next. They may be many of those who are just spending time in the area, but Morgan says that is a small minority. He says that 40 percent to 50 percent of the kids who come to the office have no idea what to do next.

But finding a proper home for all 900 kids is impossible, according to Morgan, and that may have sharpened
how many kids DHSS can take into custody.

"At this moment we probably have around 50 kids who are either in a facility that is not appropriate or kids who are in between placement plans, or kids that are reported from school to school in the kids who call the 'mother slasher' or that are being reported for truant or lack of a family, or basically they have all the children that are in the system," Morgan said.

There are not enough foster families to take the kids, and the lack of facilities prevents Morgan and his staff from working with the troubled youth and their families as long as possible in the hope of finding a place to live for the kids.

"We do not have the facilities to do that," Morgan explained. "At ROADS, we try to keep the child in the least restrictive environment possible. We do not have the space for that." Morgan has seen a sharp increase in the number of children coming to ROADS over the past few years.

"If we had more good, safe facilities to send the kids to we would probably be taking in more kids than we are now," Morgan explained. Morgan and his staff are looking for ways to provide better services to the children who are in need. They are planning to open a new facility in the near future. Morgan is hopeful that these facilities will be able to provide better care for the kids.

"State government is wonderful at giving lip service at every level about the problems of our youth and what needs to be done. But when it comes to doing something, they do nothing," Michael Tarpinian, 14, said.

Michael was previously a client at ROADS and is now a resident at the Maine Youth Center. He said that the people who work with him are great and that he feels better now. He said that he is learning about himself and who he is and he says that he likes it. And that just makes me feel good," Michael said.

Dealing with the system

"The system is a real problem for the agency and the state, according to officials at both ROADS and the Maine Youth Alternatives. They are working to improve the system and to provide better care for the kids.

"There are a lot of kids just like me in the Maine Youth Center who have nowhere to go. And they are not getting the help they need.
And the system is not doing enough to help them," Michael said.

There are many other youth in the system who are even worse off. And they are not getting the help they need.

It's time to abolish the Maine Turnpike Authority. Maine has a long history of profiteering in transportation policy. At the time of its inception, the political and economic forces that brought about the Turnpike Authority were only a few months after we unleashed even while wearing on their trots we were looking for a schtick toג Syndrome, which afflicts more than 40,000 Americans.

Researchers at the Shriners Hospital in Portland are helping kids. Their separately incorporated charity has served the needs of Mainers aged men who weave an elaborate parody of the Old Party.

It's time for citizens of conscience to put an end to this nonsense. Taking back the turnpike is the first of many steps necessary to build a transportation system that will serve the needs of Mainers rather than the pockets of investors, contractors and political hacks. It's time for Mainers to have a say in Maine's future, and the place for us to do it is at the polls on Nov. 5.

ART

The art of conversation:
Very Special Arts' David Webster

In the mid-'70s David Webster started to visit the Central Community Center in Portland, where he met with some children. He was struck by the uniqueness of these children's understanding of the world and the way they communicated with each other. He created a program called "Art at the C.C." where he would teach the children about art and how to use it as a tool for communication. This led to the formation of Very Special Arts Inc. (VSA), a national organization that promotes art education for people with disabilities.

David Webster is the author of "Art at the C.C.: A Book of Art, Poetry, and Stories," published by VSA Foundation. He is also the recipient of the 2000 Lifetime Achievement Award for Art and Disability from the American Association of University Women. He has been a crucial figure in the development of the field of art education and has been involved in numerous exhibitions and workshops across the country.

REAL PUZZLE

Draw!

According to one school of thought, it is relatively easy to understand the meaning of a phrase or statement in the context of the whole; it is only when the words are removed that the message tends to lose its meaning. The puzzle of this puzzle is not to be determined by the first bullet, but to be determined by the second bullet, and possibly the third and subsequent bullets. The puzzle of this puzzle is to determine the message of the puzzle itself. The puzzle of the puzzle is the message of the puzzle itself.

Earne Pook

LOOKING DOWN

I don’t know how long she’s been looking down at her phone, nerd, but man, I sure hope it’s not her girlfriend. She’s been staring at her phone for the past 10 minutes. She’s been texting, scrolling, and even checking her notifications. But now, she’s looking down at her phone, and I can’t help but wonder what’s going on inside her head.

2. Make sure you understand what the person is looking for.
3. Think about how you can make yourself stand out.
4. Write a response that is thoughtful and sincere.
5. Be sure to include your contact information.
