A lobster trap burst out of Casco Bay. Light shone through the splash that followed it up from the dark ocean's surface. The man who was taking it from the sea set the trap on his boat and opened the lid. Inside were a half-dozen lobsters. Stunned by the light and air around them, they kicked and snapped as the lobsterman lifted them from the watery cage.

Greg Griffin has been catching lobsters since he was a boy. He knows his way around these waters and he knows how to catch lobsters. But he doesn't know how to sell them, and he has grown uncomfortable with the way other men are selling them for him.

On Tuesday, October 24, the Portland Fish Exchange will consider their request to put lobsters on the floor of the exchange. As they do, it will be the first trip to the surface for the fledgling Maine Lobster Marketing Group. And it may foreshadow the end of a traditional way of selling lobsters.

Dee Murphy has a flotation tank which sits at the Picture Yourself, an image and relaxation center that he owns with his wife, Vicki. While Vicki, a hairdresser, helps by showing customers on her special video screen how they would look with different hairstyles, Dee tends to the tank and sells relaxation kits.

What's inside the tank? About 11 inches of water to start out with, and then about 1,000 pounds of Epsom salt. The Epsom salt gives the water its buoyancy.

Is it hot? It's kept the same temperature as your skin, which is cooler than core body temperature. If you lay very still, the water will kind of physically hold you up in the water. This enables your muscles to totally relax.

How does it work? You pull your clothes off, you jump in the tank, and you do 20 minutes. Because of the salt, you find yourself almost lying on the surface of the water. You don't have to force yourself to stay at the surface, but you do want to stay in there a little longer, to feel totally held up. It helps your muscles to totally relax.

Is it scary at first? Well, you're opening up a box, climbing in, and you're not sure where you are. You're probably already in there a little bit, you're already in there a little bit. You can hear it if you listen to the tapes that are available, you can hear it if you listen to what's called a "mind inscription," which is a passage that helps you get into different types of consciousness.

What makes you get a flotation tank? My partner and I are in the real estate business and we have clients. We've always thought that we'd like to do something like this. We've been interested in relaxation for a while, and we've been in contact with people who are doing flotation tanks. We decided to start our own, and it's worked out well so far.
