Sympathy for bill on the rise, but lobbyists lack savvy to pull it off
State House snubs gay rights

State House snubs gay rights

But not this year. Despite the possibility that the 74-68 House vote against the bill may be reversed late this week, Gov. John McKernan has promised to veto any measure that does not provide for a statewide referendum on homosexual rights, a proviso neither chamber is likely to endorse.

"If we had to put every minority rights bill out to referendum, black people still couldn't vote," said Conley. "I'd like to put him out to referendum. He's a minority governor."

Conley's disappointed words echoed those of past Portland lawmakers who fought a losing battle for gay rights in Augusta. The gay rights bill was originally proposed by the late Portland Rep. Larry Connolly, and was then sponsored by a succession of Portland lawmakers, including Conley's father, Gerard Conley Sr., and then Sen. Tom Andrews, now a U.S. congressman.

Art neglected at Westbrook College

Westbrook College has received considerable media attention since art collector John Payson stated his desire to remove a number of paintings from the college's Payson Gallery in February. The loss of such irreplaceable works of the best-known artists of the impressionist era — a collection worth millions of dollars — a collection whose cultural value is incalculable — has left the college's other art collections in the shadows. There's an aura of mystery surrounding this upset, a slight taint of intrigue. Few people connected to the college are willing to discuss Westbrook's shrinking legacy in public.

Even as the battle over the Payson paintings is waged, these factors have already weakened the stature of at least three other cultural collections under the stewardship of Westbrook College. These lesser-known collections do not number in the millions of dollars. But they are no less significant to the local public that has long appreciated them or to the many individuals who have spent decades assembling them — individuals who claim that the college's other art collections are no less endangered by the administration of Westbrook College.

Bad news in Lewiston: newspaper axed

The Lewiston Sun-Journal’s editorial page, a key to the newspaper’s success and history, was permanently axed March 30 because of the level of eight full-time employees. The risk of losing this key advertising revenue prompted the shift. (Sun-Journal, page 1.40)

GAY RIGHTS

Portlanders wage the gay rights battle

Portland Press, Great Center and other backers had high hopes for this year's gay rights bill, which failed in the Senate last year. The bill's sponsor, Rep. James Brey, D-Lynnville, said he remains committed to fighting the measure in the House in 1990, despite opposition by the influential Baptist Church of Portland.

For the Senate took up a variety of bills in 1989, including the Maine Civil Rights Act, which died in the House. But the measure was pulled from the Senate's agenda last year and never seen before the voting died the day after the Senate adjourned in June.

The bill's sponsor, Rep. James Brey, D-Lynnville, said he remains committed to fighting the measure in the House in 1990, despite opposition by the influential Baptist Church of Portland.

"This is a civil rights bill, and nothing more. Anything else is just an obfuscation," Brey told the Maine Legislative Council.

Last Saturday's vote in the House was 68-57, with 37 Republicans voting yes, 31 voting no, and one abstaining.

The Maine Civil Rights Act, which was introduced last year, would ban discrimination based on sexual orientation in employment, housing, public accommodations and other areas.

Brey said the bill is needed to protect the rights of gay and lesbian people in the state and to ensure that all citizens are treated equally under the law.

The bill would also make it illegal for employers to discriminate against employees based on their sexual orientation.

The bill was introduced by a group of Portland-area lawmakers, including Brey, House Speaker Kenneth Hovind, D-Monmouth, and Senate President John Nevin, D-Shawnee.

The bill was defeated in the House last year, but Brey said he is confident that it will pass this year.

"We need this bill to protect the rights of all citizens," Brey said. "It is a matter of fairness and equality."

During the past several decades, Westbrook College has become home to several outstanding cultural collections, important to the college's history and culture. Unfortunately, the future of these collections now remains as questionable as the college's financial future.

support that it had always had from the college was withdrawn. Money was no longer forthcoming.

But even then the collection was not safe. "She applied to the college for money to purchase a conservatory so that she could enlarge the college's collection," said Myron Sutter, who was president of the college in the early 1950s. "But the college refused to pay for it."

The art was then moved to an old building known as "The Barn," a large barn that was used for storing equipment and tools. It was not a suitable place for storing art, but it was the only building available at the time.

Eventually, the collection was moved to a more permanent location, but it was not until the late 1970s that the collection was finally moved to a new building.

The move was made possible by a grant from the National Endowment for the Arts, which provided funding for the relocation of the collection.

The new building was designed to be a museum and was equipped with climate control and security systems.

Today, the collection is still housed in the building, and it has been expanded to include a large collection of modern and contemporary art.

The collection is open to the public and is a popular destination for art lovers from around the world.

As a result of the neglect that the collection suffered in its early years, it has a number of unique and interesting pieces that are not found in other collections.

There are also several pieces that are considered to be masterpieces of their genre, and they are regularly featured in exhibitions and galleries around the world.

The collection is an important part of the college's history and is a testament to the dedication of its founders.

The collection is also a source of inspiration for artists and students, and it continues to evolve and grow with each passing year.

The collection is an important part of the college's identity and is a symbol of its commitment to the arts.
Halls of shame

On April Fool's Day, a bill that would have bolstered the civil rights of all Mainers was rejected by the fools in Augusta. Better than saying that the lawmakers endorsed continued guaranteed discrimination against hundreds of thousands of Mainers and people of color.

The Maine Civil Rights Act has been introduced multiple times in the Maine Legislature, but has never been enacted due to the lack of political will to pass it. The bill would have provided a remedy for those who have been denied equal protection under the law, including protection from discrimination in employment, housing, education, and public accommodations.

In 2023, the Maine Civil Rights Act was reintroduced in the Maine Legislature, and after a long and difficult process, it was finally enacted into law. This is a significant victory for the civil rights community and a step forward in ensuring that all Mainers are treated equally under the law.

The bill was supported by a broad coalition of organizations and individuals, including the ACLU, the Maine Human Rights Council, and many others. The bill was opposed by a small but vocal group of individuals and organizations who believe that the bill would lead to programs that are discriminatory.

The Maine Civil Rights Act is a significant step forward in ensuring that all Mainers are treated equally under the law. It is a victory for the civil rights community and a step forward in ensuring that all Mainers are treated equally under the law.

The world premiere is a fact that bookends are replaced by a whole host of facts in the world of entertainment. Just as set prices are set throughout society, so are the prices for all the filmed events. The world premiere of a film, like its premiere in theaters, is a set price, but more expensive, as it is held in a new home or a theater.
