Prosecution, persecution and politics

By Andy Nemir

For more than a year, local police chiefs and other officials have publicly scorned Cumberland County District Attorney Paul Aranson for not prosecuting more aggressively. Aranson has asserted that it's been his decision whether to prosecute a case, and that he would not devote his limited staff to minor crimes or those with only marginal proof against suspects. One noteworthy case concerned an assault charge that the Portland Police Department filed against David "The Dogman" Koplow for shoving a police officer. Portland Police Chief Michael Chitwood and other city officials berated Aranson for not taking action. But now that Aranson has chosen not to seek a third term as the county prosecutor, the most outspoken candidates for the office, David Perkins, has said that it's vital for "voters to have confidence in the justice system. "

The most zealous candidate for the office, David Perkins, has said that if elected he'll "restore (D.A.) relations with the police by aggressively pursuing all crimes. " That vow brought Perkins unprecedented endorsements from three local police chiefs, including Chitwood, Aranson's most vocal critic.

But the endorsements may come to haunt Perkins. "The District Attorney should be the first check on the police," said criminal defense attorney Tom Connolly. "I think their endorsement should mean death to a candidate...not just迎合 Chitwood." Perkins' two opponents in next Tuesday's Democratic primary, Richard Romanow and Stephen Devine, agree. Both boast careers in criminal law that the young Perkins lacks, and both claim the blessing of the chiefs is "troubling. "

"Why would chiefs of the three largest departments in the county pick the least experienced candidate?" asked Devine, "...someone who they could shape and mold, rather than someone who could hold them in check."

"I see it as a lot of hypocrisy, as sour grapes," said Perkins, who claims the other candidates sought endorsements as well. "I'm not going to be owned or controlled by the police."
"Where's Jim" was a cheap shot"

I have long considered Casco Bay Weekly the last hope for print journalism in Greater Portland, as it was accessible enough to read in the corner of your May 17 issue.

"Where's Jim" was a cheap shot of the highest order—should I say lowest order?—real estate misadventures like Thomas Adler deserve to suffer the humiliation of critical and thorough public scrutiny for committing the organized criminal conspiracy to cheat the public, including the citizens of Concord, out of the organized criminal conspiracy to cheat the public, including the citizens of Concord, out of

June 12 Primary Election:

The Big House

Among the many races on the June ballot, the contest for Maine's 1st Congressional District may have the most impact on the future in the famous state of the future. The District's voting record is likely to be decided by a small number of votes, and the outcome will be watched closely by national parties and candidates. The race is primarily between two candidates, John Conant and Peter Emery.

John Conant

Conant is currently serving as a state senator and has been a leading opponent of the state's budget cuts. He has been involved in state politics for many years, serving on various committees and in leadership positions. Conant has a strong record of fighting for the interests of his constituents, and he has been a vocal advocate for education, health care, and other social services.

Peter Emery

Emery is a former state representative who has been active in local politics for many years. He is a strong proponent of reducing taxes and cutting government spending, and he has been a vocal critic of the state's budget cuts. Emery has a strong record of fighting for the interests of his constituents, and he has been a vocal advocate for education, health care, and other social services.

Conant argues that he has the experience and the knowledge to lead the state in the right direction. He has been a leader in the state legislature, and he has served on various committees and in leadership positions.
